led to STAR TREK believability. (It also suggests much of what has been wrong in filmed sf of the past.) No, Captain Henderson wouldn't! Not if he's the kind of Captain we hope is commanding any naval vessel of ours. Nor would our Captain Kirk hug a female crewman in a moment of danger, not if he's to remain believable.

Early history. In the early 21st century, the Ba'ku were a group of enlightened Ka'bu who resided on a planet near Sector 441. The Ka'bu were a technologically advanced species, and, as with many other technologically advanced species, they developed the ability to build weapons of mass destruction, and were on the brink of annihilating themselves. Realizing that their planet faces certain destruction, they took the name Ba'ku (meaning "the Peaceful"), and departed to find themselves a new ...

According to the Star Trek: Insurrection novelization, the ancestors of the Ba'ku were called the Ka'bu (the pacifistic dissenters made a linguistic play on the name by reversing the consonants to call themselves the Ba'ku, meaning "the Peaceful"). The Ka'bu had traveled the galaxy in sophisticated space vessels and lived elegantly in the pursuit of beauty, art, and physical perfection, relying on mechanization to do their labor for them.
