Their relatives were buried in on the farm, and they wanted permission to visit the family plot. Years ago, farms were located considerable distances from town, so it was hard to reach church cemeteries where most members of the community were buried. Buying a plot in that cemetery was expensive, more money than most farmers had.

A family farm is generally understood to be a farm owned and/or operated by a family; it is sometimes considered to be an estate passed down by inheritance. Family farm businesses can take many forms, as most farm families have structured their farm businesses as corporations, limited liability corporations, and trusts, for liability, tax, and business purposes. It is a common misconception that all farms with these business structures are not family farms, when in actuality that is not true. In
